A WITTY AUCTIONEER. A young wag, who had made "going, going, gone," his profession -a great favorite among the knights of the buskin, and all good fellows, besides being a chosen favorite among the ladies-was once mounted, hammer in hand, selling a piece of furniture. He was well conversant with all the best dramatic productions of the day, and among the rest "the Hunchback," then the rage of Boston, where the joke occurred. Fanny Kemble was at the time delighting the town with Julia, and everybody was well acquaint-

"Clifford, did you say, sir? Clifford," said the auctioneer, when the mer riment had subsided, "is it cash, sir?" Clifford, the purchaser, it seems, was a bashful person, unacquainted with theatrical things, and had been somewhat alarmed at the unaccountable good humor of the crowd, so that he was afraid to open his lips again, lest he should excite another burst of fun.
